Dear Board Member:

As the principal of a suburban junior high school, I am faced with many challenges to provide a viable and positive educational program for my students. Clearly, one of the greatest challenges is presented by my quest to see that my students are properly prepared for the technological world they will encounter upon graduation in the next century.

The Telecommunications Act of 1996 seems to have opened the door for an enormous opportunity for my students. I should be able to provide the necessary access to the Information Super Highway in a manner that is educationally feasible and cost efficient. As educators, we hear a great deal about what we're expected to do to make America's students well-prepared and productive adults. It seems to me that by proposing a plan that provides free access to these instructional activities, you can go a long way in proving your resolve in helping my students succeed.

From what I understand, your decision will have a minimal effect on the overall budgets of the federally affected programs, but if you support our schools in an appropriate manner, you can feel confident that you've done your part to create an educationally superior population in the United States of America.

Sincerely,

Robert Kaufold

Dear Sir or Madam:

Please make a note of it that I support the E-Rate Telecommunications Act of 1996 for schools to have the choice to pick and choose from broadcast possible range of telecommunications services at affordable, discounted prices.

Our children are at a small private school and we do everything in our power involving fund-raisers to get these students up-to-date with the state-of-the-art in communications. We need these discounted prices.

Thank you!

Sincerely,

Larry
